Preface

The current study on “Terrorism in North Africa and the Sahel in 2016” represents the eighth report on the issue and is part of my broader, longstanding engagement on security concerns in Africa and their global implications exemplified through academic experiences, seminars, conferences, publications, and testimonies in Congress. The report focuses on security challenges in the Maghreb—Algeria, Libya, Mauritania, Morocco, and Tunisia—as well as adjacent areas such as Chad, Mali, and Niger and their regional and global strategic implications.

The first study, titled “Why the Maghreb Matters: Threats, Opportunities & Options for Effective U.S. Engagement in North Africa,” was published by the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies and the Conflict Management Program at the John Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies on March 31, 2009. This initial study was guided by a bipartisan panel, including former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, General (Ret.) Wesley Clark, Ambassador (Ret.) Stuart Eizenstat, Professor William Zartman, and other distinguished former officials and academics. The panel recommended more effective engagement in the region to prevent a brewing security crisis from erupting there.¹

The latest annual report titled “Terrorism in North Africa and the Sahel in 2015,” was published in March 2016. This publication drew similar conclusions, thereby underscoring the pessimistic reality that the region is engaged in a generational socio-cultural conflict that impacts the global community. Indeed, events continue to point to a growing “arc of instability” across the region, with consequences beyond any country’s borders.²

Last year’s report also observed that focusing international attention on the region can help enable the seeds of conflict resolution, political accommodation, economic and social development, and national reconciliation to emerge and counter the forces of instability and chaos. The publication therefore recommended that, to be sustainable and effective, these solutions require an integration of global and local resolve and resources. Without an effective menu of responses to the challenges of terrorism and instability, these threats to the world community will only continue to grow.

This collective effort over the last eight years would not be possible without a committed team. Appreciation is due to many colleagues and our global partners who provided valuable data and insights for our study. Michael S. Swetnam (CEO and Chairman, PIPS), and General (Ret.) Alfred Gray (twenty-ninth Commandant of the United States Marine Corps; Senior Fellow and Chairman of the Board of Regents, PIPS) deserve special gratitude for their continuing inspiration and support. Professor Don Wallace, Jr. (Chairman, the International Law Institute), has offered legal guidance. Sharon Layani (Research Associate and Coordinator, IUCTS) and our spring 2017 intern team provided useful research and administrative support. Members of the team included Allison Davis (University of California, Davis), Ryan Dunbar (University of California, Los Angeles), Connor Garvey (The Catholic University of America), Soomin Jung (State University of New York at Albany), Ghislain Lunven (Sciences Po, Paris), Isaac Shorser (American University), and Benton Waterous (American University).

Regional Threat Assessment

Any regional and global holistic security assessment consists of a broad range of vertical and horizontal challenges.

This 2016 review analyzes these threats – and their potential interplay – at both regional and international levels. In addition, case studies of individual countries particularly impacted by terrorism and other forms of violence are presented. Lastly, select policy recommendations are offered, followed by a chronology of incidents of terrorism in 2016 and a selected bibliography.

Terrorist Threats: 2016 and Beyond

Although this study focuses mostly on terrorism-related threats, it is important to note that other security challenges, such as epidemics, famines, and refugee crises, are of grave concern for the continent.

Since 9/11, a disturbing trend of security challenges from non-state actors with global reach has emerged in the Maghreb, Sahel, and other parts of Africa. It has been brutally demonstrated by the escalation in violent attacks mounted by an expanding array of lawless transnational militant groups, in countries ranging from Libya and Mali to Somalia and beyond.

The diverse perpetrators motivated by ethnic, racial, religious, tribal, and national ideologies, include extremist groups such as al-Qa’ida in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), Boko Haram, Ansaru, Ansar Dine, Ansar al-Sharia, the Movement for Oneness and Jihad in West Africa (MUJAO), al-Mourabitoun, the National Movement for the Liberation of Azawad (MLNA), al-Shabaab, as well as other militant recruits and displaced persons.

What is of particular concern is that under Ayman al-Zawahiri at al-Qa’ida Central, along with an AQIM led by Abu Musab Abdul Wadoud, several extremist groups, despite their distinct ethnic and tribal affiliations, are expanding their regional and global networks. This tactical franchise is based on mutual goals and relationships, including shared finances, training, supply of weapons, and joint operations. For instance, on March 17, 2017, AQIM leadership congratulated its Mali-based subsidiaries for merging into the united entity named “Jamaat Nusrat al-Islam wal Muslimeen.” The participating factions included Ansar Dine, the Macina Battalion, and al-Mourabitoun and Sahara divisions. Moreover, AQIM also sent a message to France stating:

We say to you that your oppression and persecution of the people and tribes of the Sahel and Sahara will only reinforce the brotherhood and unity among them... And it will do nothing but increase its perseverance on jihad and resistance against the attackers, and mount the Muslims; persistence to move the battle from our land to their lands, and from our cities to theirs, to make them live the fear that our people are living in our occupied lands.
What complicates the strategic global challenge of defeating terrorism even further is the emergence of the “Islamic State” (also known as ISIS, ISIL, and Daesh), whose goal is to establish a “caliphate” across the Middle East, Africa, Europe, and Asia. Indeed, dozens of movements around the world have sworn allegiance and support to Daesh. In the Maghreb, Sahel, and elsewhere in Africa, over 20 groups have affinity links to the evolving network. These include the Soldiers of the Caliphate in Algeria, the Islamic State in Libya (Darnah), the Jund al-Khilafah in Tunisia, Boko Haram in Nigeria, al-Shabaab Jubba Region Cell Bashir Abu Numan in Somalia, al-’I’tisam of the Koran and Sunnah in the Sudan, and Egypt’s Jamaat Ansar Bait al-Maqdis in the Sinai.7

Though our current 2016 risk assessment report revealed that terrorist attacks are down from the previous record high of 289 incidents in 2014, overall, terrorist incidents by AQIM and other extremist movements in the region have risen dramatically since September 11, 2011. The 235 total of incidents in 2016 thus represents a very real threat, particularly in the countries that have experienced large increases in violence in the past few years, such as Libya and Mali. During the 2016 survey period, the most affected countries were Libya (with 125 incidents), Mali (with 64 incidents), Tunisia (with 16 incidents), and Algeria (with 13 incidents).

In addition to these statistics, other attacks were recorded across Africa, in countries such as Nigeria, the Central African Republic, and Somalia. Adding to the already volatile security situation is the spillover of jihadists returning to their home countries after fighting in Iraq and Syria with al-Qa’ida and Daesh affiliates. Thus, in spite of the lower number of incidents, the overall strategic impact regionally and globally was far more dangerous in 2016 than previously, and this trend is continuing into the first three months of 2017.

In sum, the number of radical political and social actors is both proliferating and becoming increasingly linked, formally and informally, in a “holy alliance” of “like-minded” movements, as well as “strange bedfellows,” intent on trafficking, kidnapping, and violent extremism. Most worrisome, this deadly transnational terrorist network is expanding across a widening “arc of instability” that extends from the Atlantic Ocean to the Red Sea, and into the Middle East, Asia, and beyond. The strategic map of the “new terrorism hot spots” included in this study provides visual evidence of activities in North, Central, West, and East Africa, as well as links to other continents, such as Europe and North America.

Of growing concern for African security interests are the increasing links and flow of recruits between these regional extremists and the so-called “Islamic State” in Syria and Iraq, as well as al-Qa’ida affiliates and allies across the region. For example, in July 2016, Morocco announced it arrested dozens of people suspected of plotting for the Islamic State.8 And in October 2016, the Islamic State released a video of Abu Walid al Sahrawi pledging allegiance to the caliphate.9

Finally, countries in the Maghreb and Sahel are not immune to the broader threat of violence emanating from Iraq and Syria. According to the latest public data available in December 2016, some 40,000 fighters from over 120 countries, including from countries covered in this report, have participated in the wars in Iraq and Syria.10 In Libya alone, where terrorist camps exist, as many as 6,500 extremists have already been trained for future attacks. The remaining question is when and where these operatives will strike and what are the likely strategic implications regionally and globally.11
Terrorism’s Growing Regional Profile: Case Studies

According to IHS Jane’s 360 database, terrorist attacks worldwide in 2016 totaled 24,202, of which some 45 percent occurred in countries such as Syria and Iraq. The IUCTS statistics compiled for the same year covering the Maghreb and Sahel regions in Africa registered 235 attacks. Yet this comparatively low figure is, indeed, misleading for two important security assessment considerations. First, this figure reflects a general upward trend of assaults registered regionally since 9/11. Additionally, any statistical analysis of terrorist threats must be based on assessing the multiple impacts of each incident in terms of the humanitarian, political, social, economic, and strategic costs.

Thus, the case studies of Libya, Mali, Tunisia, and Algeria that follow represent the countries most victimized. A brief discussion of other regional countries such as Chad, Morocco, Mauritania, and Niger is also provided. Additionally, some security-related references are made regarding other selected African nations, from Nigeria to Somalia.

In sum, the cases examined in this report are threats to the security interests of the individual countries and also have implications for regional neighbors as well as the Middle East and beyond.
Libya

In North Africa, Libya represents the most insecure nation due, inter alia, to its porous land and maritime borders, unstable political institutions following the collapse of Gaddafi’s regime, the increase in the number of foreign fighters reinforcing indigenous extremist groups, and the expanding refugee crisis. More specifically, two rival governments have been established in the country’s different regions. In the capital Tripoli in the west, the Government of National Accord (GNA) is backed by the international community. And in the east, Benghazi, Libya’s second most populous city, is largely under the control of Libyan General Khalifa Haftar, who enjoys the support of Egypt and Russia. Clearly, the mounting internal divisions and the failure to form a unified government contribute to greater instability and continuing violence throughout the country.

Another significant challenge is the growing number of armed factions, including indigenous and foreign operatives. Dozens of these lawless and ideological militias control their own turf and are battling each other for increased power. For instance, in 2016, fighting continued over control of Sirte, where Daesh had set up a jihad training ground, leveraging the country’s instability and lack of unified government.

In 2016, it became apparent that Libya serves as a major base for Daesh, with reportedly some 5,000 fighters present in the country. What is also a particular concern is that the chaotic environment in Libya threatens to export instability elsewhere in Africa and beyond. Although considerable gains were made by the eastern-based Libyan National Army against Daesh and other Islamic operatives in 2016, security threats remain.

In 2016, Daesh, AQIM and their affiliates as well as unaffiliated Islamic militants, resorted to a wide-range of attacks, including kidnappings, hijackings, arson, shootings, bombings, shellings, assaults, assassinations, and summary executions. The attacks targeted military camps, checkpoints, ammunition depots, oil fields and facilities, and hospitals. These incidents killed and maimed a cross-section of Libyan society, such as politicians, police, military personnel, clergymen, educators, journalists, and other civilians. Another target of choice was foreigners residing, working, or visiting in Libya. Nationals from Canada, Egypt, Eritrea, Italy, the Netherlands, the Sudan and Turkey were among the victims.

Aside from the high human toll of nationals and foreigners within Libya, additional costs resulted from the persistent “migration crisis.” Indeed, “asylum seekers” and “refugees” from different African countries living in Libyan detention camps captured by various armed groups have been subjected to widespread human rights abuses.

Moreover, smugglers of migrants to European countries have also been accused of similar human rights violations (e.g., rape, starvation, and murder). The gravity of the migrant crisis is illustrated by the fact that in 2016, over 5,000 individuals, including women, children, and elderly, died on numerous small vessels from suffocating in overloaded holds, as well as from drowning in capsized boats. Despite this very high human cost, during the same year, a total of 181,436 successfully arrived in Italy via this Mediterranean route. Nevertheless, as of early 2017, the EU has been considering a proposal that advocates greater funding for programs returning migrants from Libya to their countries of origin.
In the face of these security challenges within and outside Libya, some modest collaborative responses on national, regional, and global levels are encouraging. For example, the United States and its European allies are engaged in multilateral efforts to support a unitary government in the country. And in early 2017, Algeria, Tunisia, Chad, Niger, Egypt, and the Sudan urged the different political factions in Libya to avoid using military force. Whether this conciliatory message will be implemented on the ground remains questionable.

Mali

In Mali, similar persistent instability in the war-torn northern part of the country underscored continuing volatility even four years after French forces recaptured the major cities and some of the territory in the north that had been seized by al-Qa’ida affiliate groups. Two factors contributed to Mali’s lingering instability. First, there was the failure of the government to find suitable political solutions for its internal security concerns. And second, there is the continuing flow of combatants and weapons from Libya.

Indeed, in 2016, a total of 64 attacks were recorded, an increase from the over 49 incidents registered in 2015. AQIM, the nomadic minority Tuareg insurgent rebels of the separatist Coalition of Azawad movement, Ansar Dine operatives, and militants of the ethnic group the National Alliance for the Protection of Peul Identity and the Restoration of Justice (ANSIPRJ) were involved in the escalating violence in the country.

Aside from the above groups, special attention should be focused on the expanding terrorist network of Daesh in Mali. That is, many of the jihadist affiliates, such as a splinter group of al-Mourabitoun, have sworn an oath of allegiance to the self-declared “Islamic Caliphate.” Its newest involvement in the country opens up more security vulnerabilities and therefore allows fewer options for conflict resolution.

To be sure, al-Qa’ida, Daesh affiliates, and the extremists have resorted to a wide range of operations, including kidnappings, shootings, bombing, ambushes, and facility attacks. These and other tactics have targeted security forces and civilians in 2016 and early 2017; the killed and wounded were members of Malian police and army, African and U.N. peacekeepers, French soldiers, ordinary citizens, and foreign aid workers.

Some examples are noteworthy. In December 2016, Ansar Dine members fired rockets at a “crusader” base in Kidal, causing human and material damage. Also in the same month, the Macina Battalion attacked a prison and freed all inmates. Moreover, in January 2017, al-Mourabitoun attacked a Malian military camp killing 47 and wounding 100 others.

In the face of these and other attacks, the Malian government extended a state of emergency several times, arrested some key leaders of various AQIM affiliates, and brought into the cabinet new members of rebel groups as part of the strategy to reduce jihadist violence in the country. Additionally, many African countries are contributing forces, however modest, to the UN Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in Mali (MINUSMA). Moreover, it is also encouraging that the international community has expanded its regional efforts to combat terrorism through the endeavors of the Sahel Multilateral Planning Group that includes the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Canada, and Italy.
Tunisia

In Tunisia, more than six years after the “Jasmine Revolution” overthrew the autocratic regime of President Zine El Abidine Ben Ali and inspired other countries to rise up in the “Arab Spring,” the country is still vulnerable to both domestic and foreign terrorist threats. Despite its emerging democracy, Tunisia still faces security challenges. Although 16 incidents were recorded in 2016, the weak government in Tunis continues to face considerable potential threats from national extremists, as well as from its chaotic neighbor Libya.

More specifically, AQIM (the Tunisia branch) and Daesh and its affiliates are responsible for numerous security challenges in the country and beyond. During 2016, attackers targeted police, military servicemen, politicians, civilians, and visiting foreigners. What is even more ominous is the report that between 6,000 and 7,000 citizens have left the country to join the so-called “Islamic State” abroad and 15,000 suspected recruits were banned from traveling.

It is against these concerns that the Tunisian government and the international community have developed multiple counterterrorism responses. For example, a 125-mile barrier was constructed along its border with Libya. It declared nationwide curfews during emergency situations. Security forces arrested terrorist cells and foiled potential plots. The military conducted raids against militants and seized their weapons. Courts sentenced dozens of terrorists for planning or mounting attacks. And the Tunisian authorities improved security at tourist resorts to prevent more massacres such as the June 2015 assault in Sousse where 38 people, mostly British, were killed.

International counterterrorism support has also expanded in 2016 and early 2017. The U.S. provided training to improve capabilities related to intelligence and border security, British Special Forces have assisted in the fight against Daesh, and France organized a security package that included military and economic aid.

Recognizing the added value of this and other support, in early 2017 Tunisia requested the EU and the global community to increase their help in the war against terrorism.

Niger

In 2016, Niger had a total of 12 terrorist attacks, down from 16 incidents in the previous year. Nevertheless, the country, under President Mahamadou Issoufou, still faced threats from AQIM franchise, elements of the MUJAO and Tuareg, and Boko Haram fighters. For example, in October 2016, “unidentified” operatives attacked a refugee camp in Tazalit, killing soldiers guarding the facility. It is noteworthy to mention that Niger is hosting tens of thousands of refugees mostly from Mali and Nigeria. Since Niger is unable to unilaterally confront terrorism threats, the multinational force consisting of units from Niger, Chad, Benin, Cameroon, and Nigeria is providing some military support. Additionally, non-regional nations, such as France, are also contributing support to the security concerns of Niger. Clearly, the international community needs to focus not only on defense strategies but also on strengthening social and economic developments and the rule of law.
Algeria

Although Algeria has suffered since 9/11 from terrorism more than any other regional country, the fact that only 13 attacks were registered in 2016 is a sign that President Bouteflika’s government has been successful in improving its security capabilities over the years.

To be sure, aside from the continuing threats posed by AQIM and its affiliates such as al-Mourabitoun, Algeria is facing two other challenges. The Islamic State has announced its continued intentions to be active in the country. Also, the government expressed concern about the wave of conversions to Shiism that potentially endangers even further the status of religious tolerance and public order.

During 2016 and early 2017, Algeria has undertaken multiple defensive and offensive measures to counter smuggling of drugs and weapons, stop illegal migrants, and combat terrorism. The government’s responses included building fences and walls along its borders with Libya, Tunisia, and Morocco; creating technical surveillance systems; arresting nationals and foreigners suspected of illegal activities; stopping new Daesh recruits from traveling to join the “Islamic Caliphate” wars; foiling attacks on the police, military, and civilians; and uncovering and destroying bunkers that are being used by terrorists for refuge and arms holdings.

On the international level, Algeria in October 2016 hosted the “5+5 Defense Initiative” meeting with the participation of Libya, Morocco, Mauritania, Tunisia, France, Spain, Italy, Malta, and Portugal. The government declared its willingness to strengthen global efforts to combat expanding security threats. And in March 2017, Algeria, in cooperation with Morocco, tightened its border controls in order to curb illegal migrant flows, particularly toward Libya.

Chad

Although the security situation in Chad has improved in 2016, during which only 5 incidents were recorded, in comparison to 15 attacks registered a year earlier, the country is still vulnerable to civil unrest and terrorist threats. For example, the election of long-time President Idriss Deby, winning his fifth term, triggered accusations by opposition Chadians of government corruption, censorship, arrests, kidnappings, and murder. AQIM and its affiliates, including Ansar Dine, and Boko Haram operatives, were responsible for carrying out attacks in the country. Chadians, because their country is a member of the African Union’s Multinational Joint Task Force (MNJTF) and participates in MINUSMA peacekeeping operations, were also singled out as targets of choice in Nigeria, Mali, and other countries. Bombings, mines, ambushes, firings, and direct assaults were frequently utilized tactics.

Another security concern is the grave humanitarian crisis in Chad. In July 2016, for instance, UN refugee camps in the country registered 5,643 people fleeing from regional conflicts. Additionally, it has been reported that over a million Chadians are food-insecure, and the population is potentially at risk for outbreaks of the Zika virus and other diseases, such as the waterborne guinea worm parasite.

To deal with the security challenges in Chad and elsewhere in the region, the government’s declared policy is to combine counterterrorism measures (e.g., sealing its border with Libya in an effort to prevent jihadists from crossing into the country) with requesting additional U.S. and European support to cope with the lingering social and economic threats.

Other Maghreb and Sahel Countries

Unlike the foregoing disturbing findings regarding the terrorist threats in Libya, Mali, Tunisia, Niger, and Chad, the security situation in the other regional countries – Mauritania and Morocco – in 2016 is more encouraging. Yet despite the fact that no major attacks have taken place, a few related concerns deserve consideration.

Mauritania

Mauritania under President Mohamed Ould Abdel Aziz was spared from major terrorist attacks in 2016. Yet the desert country still faced short-term security threats. For instance, some Tuaregs who cooperated with the government had been executed by AQIM. Also, Ansar Dine operatives based in Mauritania crossed into Mali, captured a prison, and released their comrades.

These and similar isolated incidents resulted in expanded governmental defense collaboration with other nations. Thus, an agreement was signed with Saudi Arabia that provided military, logistical support, intelligence-sharing, and other assistance. Additionally, Mauritania joined Burkina Faso, Chad, Mali, and Niger to establish a task force to combat terrorism in the region and to seek financial help from European countries.

Finally, a related security challenge is the humanitarian crisis due to thousands of Malian refugees residing in southeastern Mauritania. Since the government is unable to unilaterally cope with the lingering problem, the United Nations and other organizations are urged to provide further support.

Morocco

In Morocco, the security challenge continues, as illustrated by recruiting operatives for AQIM and those engaging in illegal trafficking and money laundering activities. Radicalization efforts on social media and plans to establish Daesh networks in Morocco continue.

For instance, numerous Moroccan nationals who joined al-Qa’ida and the “Islamic Caliphate” abroad are returning home. New recruits for these groups plan to travel to the Middle East and Europe. Also, thousands of migrants from different African countries have attempted to cross the Moroccan-Spanish border at Ceuta, thereby causing a considerable humanitarian burden on the country. And the four-decades-long problem of Western Sahara coupled with the challenge of the Polisario (a separatist group in Algeria), is yet to be resolved.

During 2016, Morocco continued to improve its counterterrorism capabilities, as demonstrated by multiple arrests of suspected terrorists, seizing weapons, and aborting violent plots. Particular mention should be made of the leadership of King Mohammed VI in denouncing terror and proposing the excommunication of Muslims who use their faith as justification for political violence. And in early 2017, Morocco banned the production and sale of the burqa out of concern that the shroud-like garment, which covers the entire face and body of Muslim women, would be exploited to mount terrorist attacks.41

In sum, Rabat’s holistic security strategies, ranging from expanded international cooperation (e.g., joining the African Union) to developing tolerant Islamic approaches, seem to serve as a practical model to bring potential terrorist threats to manageable levels.

West, Central, and East Africa Countries: A Brief Assessment

Clearly the “arc of instability” is stretching across a broader region beyond the Maghreb and Sahel. This spread of extremist violence is no more evident than in West, Central, and East Africa. Nigeria, the continent’s most populous nation, was the prime example of destabilization and bloodshed. Boko Haram (meaning “western education is sacrilege” in the Hausa language) continued to mount terrorist attacks and impose its version of radical Islamic law in that country and beyond.

In March 2015, Boko Haram established an alignment with Daesh, known as the Islamic State-West Africa Province (ISWAP). This major extremist movement increased its complex and deadly attacks in the region, targeting civilians, as well as government targets.

According to reports in 2016, Boko Haram has already caused some 20,000 deaths, the displacement of 2.3 million people, and $9 billion in damage in Nigeria alone.42 It has also increased operations in neighboring nations, illustrated by an attack on two cities in Niger where approximately 50,000 people were forced to flee. Although President Muhammadu Buhari expanded military campaigns against Boko Haram both in Nigeria and beyond, the group is likely to continue its attacks with greater frequency throughout the region.

Other regional countries were also targeted in 2016. In Burkina Faso, a pro-AQIM group calling itself “Ansaroul Islam” attacked “crusader forces” and threatened additional operations.43 It is estimated that hundreds of thousands are at risk in Cameroon. In the Central African Republic, a sectarian war is being waged between Muslim and Christian militias, generating an expanding humanitarian disaster. And the Democratic Republic of Congo has been subjected to internal violence by groups such as Burundian and Rwandan rebels.44

Unrest, terrorism, insurgency, and civil wars are also evident elsewhere. Al-Shabaab, through its al-Qa’ida and Daesh operatives, continues to attack the African Union Mission to Somalia (AMISOM) as well as military and civilian targets in Kenya, Uganda, and Ethiopia.45 In South Sudan, the current civil war between rival political factions threatens immediate starvation to 100,000 people and endangers an additional million citizens. And Egypt, under President Abdel Fattah el-Sisi, is still engaged in a continuing battle with extremism and terrorism against such groups as the Muslim Brotherhood and the Sinai-based Ansar Beit el-Maqdis, which pledged loyalty to Daesh.

In sum, the “long arm” of radical Islamist terrorism was increasingly evident in the Maghreb, Sahel, and beyond in 2016. It is expected that this trend will continue in 2017 not only throughout Africa but also in the Middle East, Asia, Europe, and the United States.

Conclusions and Selected Recommendations

It is hoped that this report, with its emphasis on North Africa and the Sahel, will encourage greater strategic attention and focused policy initiatives in the region to enable the seeds of conflict resolution, political accommodation, economic and social development, and national reconciliation to emerge and mitigate instability and chaos. These solutions, to be sustainable and effective, require the long-term commitment and coordination of local and international actors to resolve and provide resources. Without an effective menu of responses to the security challenges of terrorism and instability highlighted in this report, the impact will only continue to grow as a threat to the global community.

More specifically, because of the growing political uncertainty and instability in the Maghreb, Sahel, and bordering areas during 2016, many of the recommendations made in the previous seven published reports are not just relevant, but increasingly urgent. The Sahel and bordering countries continue to have large areas of ungoverned space where terrorists and other radicals move with impunity along well-traveled smuggling and supply routes that defy ongoing interdiction efforts.

The manifold security threats emanating from those countries in Africa covered in this report have additionally been compounded by security challenges in neighboring nations. Indeed, in many respects, 2016 represents a milestone year for the emergence of non-state actors as a dominant focus for security concerns in the region. The question is whether the worst is yet to come.

With so much uncertainty and widening challenges, it is imperative that the international community, in particular the West, work diligently with regional authorities to implement and expand security capabilities. In addition, focus must be placed on political, social, and economic development programs to generate more effective antidotes to the poisons that are growing threats to the stability, peace, and prosperity of the region.

Clearly, the stakes are too high for America to disengage from the Maghreb and the Sahel. Increases in regional terrorist attacks since 9/11 are being fed by the greater instability found in weak and transitioning states. This report does not recommend that the U.S. take upon itself the role of arbiter of regional security issues. Rather, it is a reminder that America’s vital interests in the region and those of its friends and allies are under assault by extremists who are doing us harm and want to inflict more damage in their wake.

To be sure, there are no “silver bullets” in combating terrorism, instability, and insecurity. The scope of what must be done is quite broad, and the report's recommendations cover both hard and soft solutions. They include a variety of tactical and strategic steps that are needed to improve security and stability in the region, ranging from reducing the presence and impact of terrorism and other forms of violence to expanding the capacity for transparent, effective local leadership. The following recommendations are not fully inclusive, but hopefully provide a useful framework for continued discussion and action.

Five major recommendations are suggested for short- and long-term policies and actions:

First, broaden United Nations and other international efforts in helping Africa prepare unilaterally and collectively to respond to future infectious diseases and related health security challenges;

Second, develop a global strategy to cope with African-based grave humanitarian crises, particularly focusing on migration, refugees, and hunger challenges;

Third, take proactive steps with regional and global partners to prevent future radicalization, instability, and violence;

Fourth, reinforce the security capabilities of local and regional leaders with both hard and soft power; and

Fifth, invest in human and economic development to enhance national and regional security.

These broader recommendations must necessarily be implemented through a coordinated combination of smaller and larger steps. They include the following selected measures:

1. Strengthen U.S. and NATO intelligence assets by broadening cooperation through AFRICOM, NATO’s Partnership for Peace, and other modalities that supply and support training, equipment, and monitoring of resources throughout the region.

2. Continue to expand U.S. counterterrorism technical assistance and training to internal security personnel.

3. Host programs to provide assistance over the longer term to support inclusive political dialogue and the robust empowerment of civil society to advance consensus-building and the development of conflict-resolution mechanisms.

4. Work to settle intra-regional conflicts that provide openings for extremists to exploit and impede security and economic cooperation such as the Western Sahara dispute and the problem of refugees in the Polisario-run camps in Algeria. Also, collaborate with the global donor community to conduct a census of the camps to ensure that humanitarian aid is not diverted, from this location or elsewhere, for military purposes or personal enrichment.

5. Support country-specific reforms and regional programs, such as the International Institute for Justice and the Rule of Law in Malta that provides legal training for law enforcement officials, as well as efforts to promote human rights, economic development, independent judiciaries, and transparency in governance.

6. Recognize the importance of, and provide quiet encouragement to, Muslim leaders in promoting the practice of a moderate Islam, as well as counter-radicalization programs that limit the appeal of extremist recruiters, in particular from the so-called "Islamic State."
7. Continue critical infrastructure programs, such as Power Africa and the Trans-Africa Highway, through foreign assistance and investments from the U.S. private sector in public-private sector partnerships.

8. Work with international donor agencies and support “triangular aid” projects in areas of health, water, sanitation, power, primary education, and related necessities. Initiate and advance indigenous solutions whenever possible.

9. Promote regional trade and investment by expanding the US-Morocco Free Trade Agreement to include goods and products from North, West, and Central Africa.

10. Renew various foreign assistance programs through the new U.S. administration, as well as other government efforts, such as developing young leaders in the public and private sectors.

Finally, these recommendations recognize that the region's security requirements can only be fulfilled by accepting the need for consistent and well-defined steps. To be sure, achieving these objectives is not solely a U.S. responsibility. America's engagement will be effective only if it can partner with friends and allies, in Europe and elsewhere, to implement the measures that, over time and with strong local participation, can greatly reduce the security threats emanating from these regions in turmoil, which stretch across Africa and beyond.

The war the international community, particularly the West, is waging is generational, institutional, and unavoidable. With America’s partners in Europe, the Middle East, Africa, Asia, and other regions, there are solutions that can be achieved based on shared values and mutual interests. While the nations of the Maghreb and Sahel manage their local crises, America’s leaders should place more emphasis on building public support for the hard and soft power solutions that will make a difference regionally and globally.

Terrorism Incidents in 2016

Data Table: Terrorism Incidents in Maghreb & Sahel since Sept. 11, 2001

Total: 235,239
Incidents of Terrorism in Maghreb & Sahel:

Chronology from September 11, 2001 to December 31, 2016 (Updated with 2016 incidents below)

For full listing from 9/11/01 to 12/31/016, go to:
2010:
2011:
2012:
2013:
2014:

Methodology — Compilation of this comprehensive listing of Maghreb/Sahel terrorism is based on monthly review of respected news and think tank websites, including international media and national press in the countries monitored—Algeria, Chad, Libya, Mali, Mauritania, Morocco, Niger, and Tunisia. “Terrorist incidents” counted are those where a recognized terrorist group is reported or believed responsible, and results in death, injury, or kidnapping of civilians, government officials, or security services, or destruction of property, or threat to life and property where attacks are thwarted or bombs defused. Every incident includes the source cited.

Not included are acts of violence that occur in the context of explicit civil war or open armed conflict areas—as generally reported by the news media—and also terrorist losses in government counter-terror actions, or indigenous acts of religious extremism by ethnic and religious groups, including application of strict religious law. Lack of publicly available information likely results in undercounting in regions controlled by terrorists/extremists, with higher—though more accurate—relative counts where media outlets are more firmly established.

All eight countries have suffered terrorist incidents during the 15 years tracked since Sept. 11, 2001. The 2015 Chronology below includes those countries experiencing incidents during the past calendar year — Libya, Mali, Tunisia, Niger, Chad, and Algeria — listed by order of frequency of attacks. See table on preceding page and hyperlinks above for incidents experienced by Mauritania and Morocco in other years.
